It is hard to imagine how a person can frequently participate in brutal, graphic, and realistic acts of simulated violence and not be affected in some morally relevant sense. Studies of children have shown that they are(46) adult help concerning real-life violence and they will witness a higher level of real-life violence after viewing violence on television. Among adults, physiological responses(47) after viewing violent television. So it seems unlikely that there would be no morally(48) effects to playing games where one is not passive and merely observing violence committed by others, but the player is actually pulling the joystick trigger and inflicting simulated harm him/herself.(49) dictates that playing such games makes committing real violence easier, however slightly. It also dictates that aside from the harm a person might do to others, playing violent computer games(50) must have a negative effect on his or her moral character. On the other side of the debate, one might argue that(51), however realistic, is not morally objectionable simply because it is fake. Real humans are what matter in the moral(52) of one's actions; real harm happens between real people and in video games there are neither. Acting like you are hurting someone(53) someone. And acting like you are hurting a monster or an idealized(54) of a person is even further removed from doing any real harm. Simulating an act that is morally objectionable is not itself morally objectionable, or else we would(55) an actor in a play or movie playing the part of a serial killer is also doing something morally objectionable.

Part F: Reading Comprehension

Direction: In this part of the test, you will read three passages. Each passage is followed by some questions. Answer the questions by choosing the best choice (1), (2), (3), or (4). Then mark the correct choice on your answer sheet.

Passage 1:

The Pacific Ocean was sighted by Europeans first in 1513 when the Spanish explorer Vasco Núñez de Balboa's expedition crossed the Isthmus of Panama from the Caribbean side, westward to the Pacific Ocean. During its voyage (1519-1522), Ferdinand Magellan's expedition sailed the Pacific after spending three months and twenty days navigating the stormy strait at the southern tip of South America. Magellan reached the Mariana Islands in March 1521, and sailed on after killing some of the natives and naming the islands Ladrones, Spanish for "thieves."

The García Jofre de Loaysa expedition of 1525–1527 crossed the southern Pacific Ocean from east to west, and briefly established a Spanish colony in Tidore. Andrés de Urdaneta (1498–1568) sailed on the Loaysa voyage and studied the winds and currents, surviving the failed colonization effort and demonstrating how a voyage could be made from west to east by sailing north from the Philippines to Japan. This became the main trade route until the explorations of the British and French navies in the second half of the eighteenth century.

In 1564, conquistadors led by Miguel López de Legazpi crossed the ocean from Mexico to the Philippines and Mariana Islands in six vessels. In 1567, Álvaro de Mendaña de Neira (1541–1595) sailed west from Callao in Peru to western Melanesia. For the remainder of the sixteenth century, Spanish influence was paramount, with ships sailing from Spain to the Philippines, New Guinea, and the Solomon Islands.

 - 3) Magellan reaching the Mariana Islands before Andrés de Urdaneta's birth
 - 4) De Urdaneta's death after de Neira sailing toward western Melanesia
- 60- According to the passage, which of the following statements is true?
- 1) The Spanish colony established by the Loaysa expedition in Tidore exists more or less intact today.
 - 2) Núñez de Balboa was on the first European expedition sailing to the Pacific Ocean in the early 15th century.
 - 3) De Urdaneta played a part in showing that there is a path from west to east by sailing north from the Philippines to Japan.
 - 4) Conquistadors sailed to the Philippines and Mariana Islands on a ship operated by only 6 sailors and led by Miguel López de Legazpi.

Passage 2 :

In large part, the greenhouse effect is natural and necessary. Without it, the oceans would freeze over and most life would die. However, humans have increased the greenhouse effect significantly in a mere century or two, giving Earth's delicately balanced climate machine a sudden, unintended push. The consequences of that push are only beginning to be seen. Warming, which is the primary or basic effect, triggers a host of other changes: more rain and snow in some places and less in others, more floods and droughts, melting of mountain glaciers and ice caps, rising seas, and extinctions of plants and animals. This is why scientists prefer the phrase "global warming" when speaking of the temperature increase as such and "global climate change" when speaking of global warming plus all the climate changes that warming causes. A few regions, such as parts of Antarctica, may even become cooler or see more snow as the world gets warmer, but such local exceptions do not contradict global warming. There is also the haunting possibility of abrupt, tipping-point climate changes that are difficult to predict but potentially drastic.

In the early 21st century, there is global concern about climate change. The well-being or survival of hundreds of millions of people may soon be threatened by rising sea levels, disrupted food production, extreme weather, and emergent diseases. Estimates of the costs of climate change over the next century range in the scores of trillions of dollars, while irreversible losses such as species extinctions and lost lives cannot be reckoned in dollar terms. Scientists are certain that global climate change is happening and are convinced that it is mostly caused by humans. Beginning with the 1990s, public debate has turned from the question of whether climate change is real to the question of what can be done to decrease its impacts and to prevent further damage to Earth's environment.

- 61- According to paragraph 1, which of the following best describes the writer's opinion about referring to parts of Antarctica as evidence against global warming?
- | | |
|-----------------|---------------------|
| 1) Disagreement | 2) Ambivalence |
| 3) Indifference | 4) Guarded approval |

- 62- Which of the following pairs of techniques is used in paragraph 1?
 1) Sarcasm and Statistics 2) Statistics and Cause & effect
 3) Exemplification and Sarcasm 4) Cause & effect and Exemplification
- 63- According to paragraph 2, all of the following are in a way associated with climate change EXCEPT
 1) severe weather conditions 2) emergence of possible diseases
 3) inevitable international conflicts 4) significant financial expenses
- 64- The passage provides sufficient information to answer which of the following questions?
 I. What are some of the diseases which are particularly associated with an increased global temperature?
 II. Does the scientific community confirm the role of human-related factors in global climate change?
 III. In which decade was the difference between global warming and global climate change first highlighted?
 1) Only II 2) Only III 3) I and II 4) I and III
- 65- According to the passage, which of the following statements is NOT true?
 1) The greenhouse effect contributes to global warming, which subsequently initiates numerous phenomena, including floods as well as droughts.
 2) Certain outcomes of climate change are irreversible, including the extinction of species and the loss of human lives, which cannot be quantified in monetary terms.
 3) The greenhouse effect is indispensable to the preservation of many life forms on the Earth, but reckless human interventions have intensified this phenomenon, disturbing the planet's climatic equilibrium.
 4) Since the 1990s, the discourse within the public sphere has shifted away from a contemplation of the measures necessary to mitigate the consequences of climate change to more pressing issues.

Passage 3 :

In the history of the human mind, there have been few more striking proofs of the organic unity in which the varied manifestations of national life are bound together than that afforded by the social causes and effects of German Romanticism. Few literary movements have demonstrated more impressively the futility of individual culture if it lacks a large sense of common responsibility. [1] The predominance, in modern German society, of fact over theory, of common sense over genius, of practical tasks over ideal aspirations, may, to a large extent at least, be explained as a wholesome reaction against the excesses of Romantic wilfulness. [2]

German Romanticism, in its early phases, was a result of political atrophy combined with highest literary culture; it was a consequence of the abnormal condition in which at the beginning of the nineteenth century the intellectual aristocracy of the nation found itself. Through the noble poets and thinkers of the older generation, the educated classes of Germany had attained to such a degree of philosophic and artistic refinement, they had acquired such a wealth of common ideal possessions as only the few greatest epochs of human history have seen. Genius, as has well been said, was in the air. But what part was there for genius to play? What opportunity was there for it to influence the life of the people at large? Astonishing as it may seem, it is true that now as little as in the time of Frederick the Great was there a place in Germany for genius except on the throne (where it, however, not always showed itself) and in the ideal realm of literature and art. Even now the way toward national reform and collective enterprise seemed to be hopelessly blocked. Even now the great intellectual leaders of the age were isolated individuals without any large and compact following. [3]

In other words, German classic literature, with all its magnificent achievements, lacked that firm foundation in popular tradition and belief which is the surest safeguard of an even and uninterrupted intellectual growth. And thus, at the very height of its development, it turned back, as it were, upon itself, and again gave way to that excessive and morbid craving for individual liberty from which, in the Storm and Stress movement, it had taken its start. [4] Romanticism in its early form was a caricature of Classicism; it was individualism run mad.

- 66- The underlined word “futility” in paragraph 1 is closest in meaning to
 1) resilience 2) inefficacy 3) prospect 4) inviolability
- 67- According to paragraph 1, which of the following is NOT true about German Romanticism?
 1) In a way, it manifested a kind of organic unity.
 2) It somehow influenced the modern German society.
 3) In a sense, it emphasized rationality at the expense of genius.
 4) It reveals in a way the significance of a sense of common responsibility.
- 68- According to the passage, which of the following statements is true?
 1) German classic literature was firmly based in the prevailing popular traditions, which serve as a reliable guarantor of an uninterrupted intellectual progress.
 2) The nascent stages of German Romanticism originated from a confluence of political debilitation and highest literary culture.
 3) During the German Romantic period, very much like that of Frederick the Great, genius took pride of place among the people at grassroots level.
 4) The educated class of German society, pulling themselves up as if by their own bootstrap, achieved a high level of philosophical and artistic sophistication without assistance from others.
- 69- Which of the following statements can best be inferred from the passage?
 1) Concepts or zeitgeists sometimes exert unintended influences within the cultural locales where they currently dominate or once pervaded.
 2) Romanticism found fertile ground in numerous other European countries, where it successfully contributed to political reform and revolution.
 3) Frederick the Great was the founding father of the ancient German society who dedicated himself to ancient Romantic ideals in an otherwise classical world.
 4) A short-lived literary movement, Storm and Stress was the culmination of Romanticism in its concluding stages.
- 70- In which position marked by [1], [2], [3] or [4], can the following sentence best be inserted in the passage?
 They were like generals in command of an army in which the rank and file was made up of officers, each of whom would rather act upon his own strategic notions than obey his superior's orders.
 1) [1] 2) [2] 3) [3] 4) [4]
